Such parts have specified tolerances that require accurate adjustment of the shaft or bearing system to maintain the accuracy of the clock timepiece. Therefore, the individual components of the clock parts are required to be carefully mounted and pre-aligned in accordance with the design specifications. This requires special precision equipment for mounting components and assembly on a timepiece shaft. Certain such equipment is not readily adjustable or movable, and some of the equipment requires complex tooling that limits the amount of timepiece production per day. Further, such production systems may result in inaccuracies in the mounting of timekeeping components to the timepiece. Accordingly, it is desirable to provide an improved system for mounting components in a timepiece that is readily adjustable. In one aspect the invention comprises a timekeeping system for a timepiece. The timekeeping system includes a timepiece watch case having a case wall defining an aperture; a timepiece mechanical assembly including a timepiece component disposed within the aperture of the timepiece case, and a timepiece component support member having a timepiece component support and a threaded boss, wherein the timepiece component support is rotatable about a first axis relative to the case wall and the threaded boss has a threaded bore and a threaded boss axis and has a defined fastening axis, wherein the threaded bore of the threaded boss is substantially concentric with the timepiece component support and the threaded boss axis is substantially parallel to the fastening axis and wherein the timepiece component has a timepiece component mounting projection and the threaded boss is cooperatively engaged with the mounting projection of the timepiece component; and a timepiece adjustment assembly including a timepiece adjustment member having an outer thread, wherein the outer thread is cooperating with the threaded bore of the threaded boss of the timepiece component support member, and wherein the timepiece adjustment member is rotatable about a second axis relative to the case wall and f678ea9f9e
